In Christ,

This Wednesday marks the 50th anniversary of Blessed Pope Paul VI's important encyclical on the topic of human procreation, Humanae Vitae. In the last two bulletins we looked at how he first addressed what the issues of the day are and the related moral questions, and the important relationship between married love and responsible parenthood. If you missed those you can find previous bulletins on our parish website.

The pope continues by affirming that the Church believes that the sexual activity of a husband and wife, by which they are uniquely united to one another and human life is transmitted, is "noble and worthy" – it is good. He said that this is true even if, "for reasons independent of their will," the act does not lead to pregnancy. By God's design in nature "new life is not the result of each and every act of sexual intercourse." Spacing between children happens naturally. In observance of natural law which the Church interprets by her constant doctrine, the pontiff emphasizes, "that each and every marital act must of necessity retain its intrinsic relationship to the procreation of human life." Sex and procreation are intrinsically related and should not be considered as separable.

Both the unitive (brings husband and wife together) and procreative aspects are inherent to the marriage act. Marriage retains its fullest purpose and dignity only when both of these (mutual love and openness to life) are retained. Reasonable people should agree that for a spouse to demand and have sex with the other without concern for the other's wellbeing would not be a true act of mutual love and "therefore offends the moral order." Similarly, an act which impairs the ability to become pregnant as God the Creator has designed into the nature of the marriage act is equally offensive to the moral order. Man is neither the master of procreation nor of the nature of his body. He cannot claim total authority over the purpose or function of his body, including specifically his sexual faculties, which in its nature has a role in the identity of the person and is critical to the generation of life, "of which God is the source."

Based on these natural and Christian doctrines of marriage and sex, the Vicar of Christ goes on to clearly state what is morally condemned: 1) Direct interruption of the sexual act in order to avoid insemination, 2) direct abortion even for health reasons, 3) direct sterilization of either the man or woman (e.g. vasectomies and tubal ligations), 4) any action which either before (e.g. chemical contraception), at the moment of (e.g. barrier), or after sexual intercourse (e.g. "Plan B") is specifically intended to prevent procreation.

He concludes this section by clarifying general moral principles. First, a single, freely chosen immoral action is never justifiable; neither for accomplishing a perceived good, nor for avoiding a greater evil. The ends do not justify the means. Likewise, it is not permissible to think that one single immoral act is made licit when accompanied with many moral acts. Therefore, Paul VI says, "it is a serious error to think that a whole married life of otherwise normal relations can justify sexual intercourse which is deliberately contraceptive and so intrinsically wrong." For him to say that it is "intrinsically wrong" means that it is a moral evil in and of itself, and can never be justified either by intention, circumstance, or other related acts. Nonetheless, it is licit to procure a legitimate medical procedure or medication for good health that might also have the second, unintended effect of impeding procreation, "provided such impediment is not directly intended for any motive whatsoever" (e.g. hysterectomy).

In the next bulletin we'll look at Pope Paul VI's response to objections, and his prophetic assessment of what wide spread acceptance of contraception would look like in the world.

Totus Tuus,
Fr. Todd Lloyd
